EXECUTIVE SUMMARY: HOW DO WE REACH YOUNG VOTERS?

The right to vote is often heralded as one of the most fundamental rights enjoyed by citizens of democracies, and yet a significant number of young Americans remain on the sidelines when Election Day arrives. According to the U.S. Census Bureau, only 41.9 percent of 18 to 24-year-olds cast ballots in the 2004 presidential election. That's compared to 58 percent of the general population and 52 percent of 25 to 44-year-olds who voted in the same election.

Low turnout rates among young people are not a new phenomenon. Close to fifty percent of 18 to 24-year-olds voted in 1972 when the voting age was first lowered to 18, but since then this age group's voting rates have declined. Turnout in 2000, one of the closest presidential contests in our nation's history, was only slightly higher than in 1996, the year with the lowest turnout since the U.S. Census Bureau began recording the figures in 1964.

And while more young Americans participated in 2004 than in 2000, the increase in turnout by less than six percentage points was smaller than what the dozens of groups working to register young voters had hoped it would be.

According to a 1998 survey conducted by the National Association of Secretaries of State (NASS), most young non-voters don't participate because they don't believe their votes will make a difference, or they don't have enough information about the candidates. And while youth volunteerism is on the rise – close to 60 percent of the survey participants said they volunteer regularly – that same sense of civic responsibility just isn't enough to get them to the polls on Election Day.

NASS and the thirty-nine secretaries who serve as chief state election officials believe more can be done to reach these disconnected citizens. That's why NASS established the New Millennium Young Voters Project in 1998, and it's why we continue to identify the new and creative ways in which states are reaching out to young Americans.

This year we found that more states than ever before are working to engage eligible young voters. This 2005 New Millennium State Practices Survey provides a snapshot of the states' many youth outreach efforts nationwide.

STATISTICAL SUMMARY

Forty states participated in this year's NASS New Millennium State Practices Survey. The following statistics are based on their responses.

Youth Outreach Programs

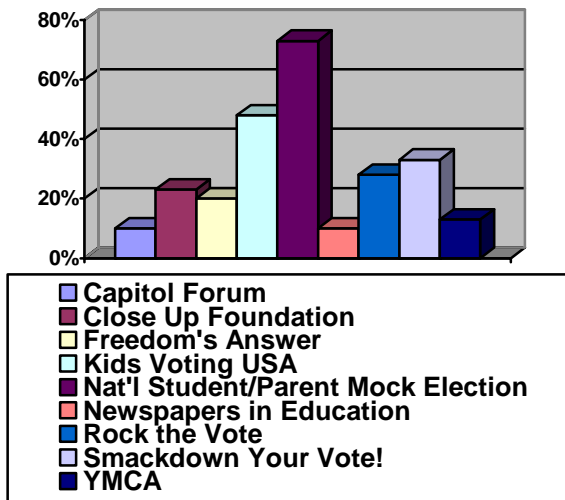

Almost every state NASS surveyed is actively working to engage young people. Ninety-eight percent of the states have either established their own youth outreach programs or partner with national organizations to reach young people.

National Partnerships

Most states have expanded their efforts to increase civic participation among young people through partnerships with national nonpartisan, nonprofit voter outreach organizations. Ninety-eight percent of state offices cooperate with one or more of these groups.

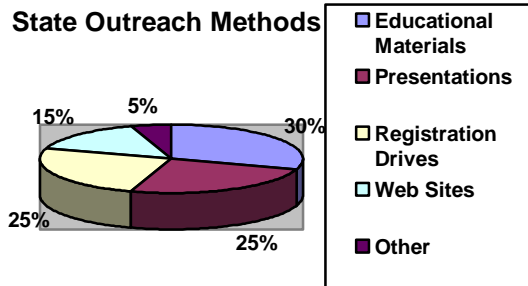

Nine of these organizations work with 10 percent or more of the states NASS surveyed. The most popular group, National Student/Parent Mock Election, partners with 73 percent of the survey respondents. Kids Voting USA is the second most popular group with a 48 percent partnership rate.

States Partnering with Outreach Groups

Outreach Methods

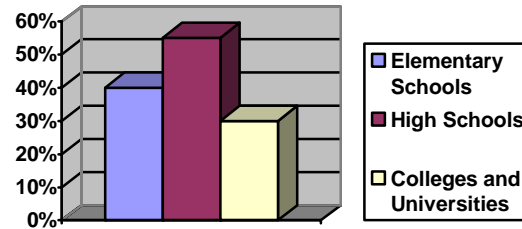

The states use a variety of different methods to communicate with eligible young voters. The most common are educational materials and civics curriculum, presentations at area schools, voter registration drives and Web sites.

Outreach Through Education

Sixty-three percent of the states NASS surveyed work directly with schools to reach young people. High schools are the most popular, followed by elementary schools and colleges and universities.

States Working with Schools

Young Poll Workers

According to reports released before the 2004 elections, the country was expected to fall half a million short of the two million people needed to work the polls on Election Day. Recruiting poll workers has long been a challenge for the states. Now, seventy-nine percent of them are attempting to address the shortage by hiring poll workers under the age of 18. More states are considering laws that would allow them to recruit and hire young people, a practice that is endorsed by some as another way to engage this age group.

Election Day Registration

Fifteen percent of the survey respondents either allow voters to register on Election Day or do not require voters to register at all.

During the 2004 election, Alabama launched their statewide Take a Kid To Vote program with a play on the capitol steps featuring a live goat in the role of the "kid." The Secretary of State distributed a voting workbook for kids that was created by a group of Alabama teachers, and held a series of assemblies at elementary schools throughout the state.

The Secretary and her staff also visit universities and high schools to distribute mail-in registration forms. The secretary mailed letters to every school system's government teachers that included voter registration forms and voter education materials.

The State of Alaska recently passed legislation that allows state residents younger than 18 to serve as poll workers. In 2004, the state focused on recruiting 16-year-olds to work the polls and the Office of the Lieutenant Governor will again focus its efforts on recruiting young poll workers in 2006.

In 2002, the state established the Alaska Democracy Project to educate students about the responsibilities of citizenship. The Project Web site included tips for raising good citizens, civic education links and resources.

The Lieutenant Governor's Office conducted Let's Vote Alaska in 2000, a statewide, nonpartisan initiative designed to increase turnout among 18 to 24-year-olds. The program boosted turnout in this age group by close to 50%.

A new law in Georgia allows grandparents to take grandchildren ages 12 and under to the polls with them. The Secretary's Office encourages grandparents to take their grandchildren to the polls, and has prepared an educational activity booklet that describes the different aspects of elections, with worksheets that can be completed with assistance from grandparents, as well as by the child alone.

The Office has also developed three versions of a voting bingo game that is utilized across the state: Voting Bingo (generic), Black History Voting Bingo (throughout February), and Women's History Voting Bingo (throughout March). Aimed at elementary school students, the games teach basic voting terms and concepts.

Representatives of the Department of State visit schools around the state, speak with students about the importance of participating in the electoral process, demonstrate voting equipment, and register eligible students.

Georgia works with college students through classroom discussions, public service announcements and brochures designed to promote civic participation. In 2004, Georgia provided college IT departments with two screen savers that encouraged students to vote on Election Day. In 2005, Georgia worked with campus orientation staff members to include information about voting in freshmen packets.

Georgia also conducts college voter registration competitions. In 2005, the program will be expanded to include at least 30 college and technical school campuses, specifically during the months of September and October. Department of State representatives will work with student groups on campus to organize voter registration drives, debates between local politicians/government officials and letter writing campaigns.

In 2000, Georgia created an Honoring Vets with Votes program. During the program's first year, the state surveyed veterans and shared the collected information with young people and encouraged them to vote in honor of "their" veterans. The program was expanded to include a Web site in 2002, and in 2003, the state worked with three high schools to encourage interaction between students and veterans.

The Secretary's Office distributes a brochure at high schools and voter registration drives that is designed to encourage young people to serve as poll workers. The brochure is used by all 159 counties in Georgia, and the State School Superintendent has encouraged schools to give students an excused absence when they work in the polls.

In January 2006, the Secretary of State's Office will host the third annual College Day at the Capitol. The Office hopes to host more than 150 students as they learn first-hand about the legislative process, speak one-on-one with legislators and governmental leaders, and network with peers who are interested in becoming more civically active in their communities.

The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania conducts a student mock election program with assistance from the National Student/Parent Mock Election and the Department of Education. The program is held every two years during the general election to help educate school-age youth about the voting process.

Pennsylvania launched the Student Voices Project, a non-partisan initiative of Governor Edward G. Rendell, in March 2003 to educate youth about the importance of voting and civic engagement.

Pennsylvania's Governor Rendell and the Department of State launched a voter registration program in 2004 aimed at graduating high school seniors. Voter registration applications were sent to every public and private high school in the state.

In partnership with Pennsylvania's Departments of Education and Military Affairs, the Department of State sponsors a Vote with a Vet – Register and Vote program. The program's goal is to encourage voter participation among high school students who are eligible to vote, while teaching young people about the state's veterans and their sacrifices.

The Rhode Island Secretary of State developed Civics 101, a civics curriculum for high school students. The curriculum focuses on the history of democracy in the U.S., introduces a step-by-step guide to our electoral system and aims to engage students in the practice of voting.

The Rhode Island Secretary of State also produces an activity guide for children that details the history of the Rhode Island State House and provides information on the General Assembly and executive elected officials.

The Secretary of State holds mock and student government elections for high schools throughout the state using optical scan voting equipment. The Secretary also visits schools throughout the state to impress upon young people the importance of voting and civic participation.

The Secretary of State sends emails to college students before primary and general elections encouraging them to vote.

In 2004, the Secretary's Office partnered with a local radio station and the ACTIVOTE program to target young people, and distributed coloring pages that provided children and their parents with important messages about voting.

Texas will release an updated version of the state's Project V.O.T.E. curriculum for pre-kindergarten through 12th grades, which will include an interactive Web site. More than half a million students participated in the state's 2004 Project V.O.T.E. mock election and, for the first time, teachers could submit election results online. CD's containing the curriculum for the student mock election were mailed to all 1,100 school districts in the state.

Graduation cards with voter registration applications were mailed to 245,606 high school graduates and 1,629 campuses statewide. High school principals distributed the cards in classrooms and during graduation ceremony exercises.

Secretary Williams visited high school campuses across the state to talk to students about the importance of voting.

The College Council on Civic Awareness, which is made up of one representative from each college and university in Utah, meets monthly in the Lieutenant Governor's office to discuss civic awareness among 18 to 24-year-olds. Each council member also represents an organization on his or her own college campus that plans civic and voter outreach programs. The Council also coordinates an annual week-long voter registration drive that incorporates political rallies, guest speaker events, dances and barbecues.

The mission of the Council has been expanded to include a poll worker recruitment program and a training component that helps voters and election judges learn new voting technology.

Washington has implemented an 18th Birthday Voter Registration Program. The Secretary of State sends a birthday card to state residents when they turn 18 encouraging them to register and vote.

Washington's VOTE Program provides voting and election information to children and young adults. It was designed to be an educational tool that uses the Internet to effectively deliver curriculum. Along with lesson plans, each category has a fun and games section with puzzles, quizzes and word games that build on the civic-responsibility themes.

Washington also holds two separate contests for students: an art contest for fifth graders who wish to have their art considered for the official Washington State Voters Pamphlet and an essay contest for high school seniors who write essays on why every vote counts.
